

Regulations on deposit of research theses (from various official University sources)

The deposit of research theses with university libraries is a universal practice and is seen as part of the public and visible research activity of the University. Online open access is seen as having a number of advantages including: increased visibility and consultation of your thesis, increased visibility for the author of the thesis, increased use and recognition of the work. Deposit is enforced by the examination regulations and the University is committed to the widest dissemination of research theses produced by its graduate students.

Doctoral theses in International Relations at Oxford have won a remarkable number of national and international prizes, including those of the British International Studies Association and the Political Studies Association. In the last ten years, 30 doctoral theses in International Relations have been published as monographs.

Examination regulations

Once a candidate has been provisionally granted leave to supplicate, he or she must submit a finalized copy of the thesis, as approved by the examiners, to the Examination Schools for deposit in the relevant university library. This should incorporate any corrections or amendments which the examiners may have requested of the candidate. The examiners must confirm in writing in their report to the board that any corrections required have been made.

Candidates should note that leave to supplicate is conditional upon receipt by the Examination Schools of the library copy of their thesis and that candidates may not proceed to take their degree until they have fulfilled the requirement to submit a library copy of the thesis.

The printed copy

The library copy of the thesis must be in a permanently fixed binding, drilled and sewn, in a stiff board case in library buckram, in a dark colour, and lettered on the spine with the candidate's name and initials, the degree, and the year of submission.

Digital copies

Candidates for the degrees of D.Phil., M.Litt. & M.Sc. by Research who began their course on or after 1st October 2007 are also required to deposit a copy of their thesis with the Oxford Research Archive (ORA). Information regarding this process can be found on the Bodleian website and will be sent with your result letter.

You should deposit two copies of your digital thesis in ORA. Both copies should include all corrections as in the final passed version of the thesis. Please see information on Preparing your thesis for instructions how to restrict access to parts of your thesis.

- i) the original source file with no security settings for the purpose of preservation. This copy will not be made freely available. This copy should be identical to the print copy.
- ii) a PDF (PDF/A preferred) copy (which may have security settings and embargoed material) for distribution. This copy will be made freely available (if not under embargo)

Embargo

Digital copies of theses are subject to a default 3 year embargo. The Divisions strongly support open access to theses produced by their students. However, during this period whilst both authors and publishers adapt to open access, the Divisions have agreed that by default, access to the full text of digital theses will be restricted for three years. Authors should indicate as such on the ORA online deposit form. Students need not formally apply for restricted access using form GSO3C to set this embargo. Authors can choose to override this default and make their thesis open access either at deposit or at any time during the three year embargo. Students who wish to make their thesis freely available on deposit or before the end of the three years should indicate as such on form GSO3A and on the online ORA deposit form. However, if your thesis contains sensitive or copyright information such that it should be subject to dispensation from consultation beyond the end of the embargo, you should apply for dispensation using form GSO3C.

Copyright

Copyright in the thesis usually rests with the author: this does not change when you deposit your thesis in ORA. No ownership is assumed by the Bodleian Libraries over the work. However, for content included in your thesis where copyright is held by a third party, you MUST ensure that you have permission from copyright holders before making it freely available on the internet via ORA. You must also ensure that you comply with permissions for access to content in your thesis for any material covered by intellectual property rights (such as patentable, sensitive, commercially restricted material etc). This does not apply in cases of 'fair dealing for the purposes of criticism or review' where UK copyright law allows for the use of short quotations, extracts or excerpts without the permission of the copyright holder of the work from that been made previously publically available. More details are available on the Bodleian eTheses web pages:

http://www.bodleian.ox.ac.uk/ora/oxford_etheses/copyright_and_other_legal_issues/copyright_held_by_third_parties_and_other_rights

Users of your thesis will be made abundantly aware of the rights of the author and the use that they are permitted to make of the thesis. This will be by way of a user permission statement which appears on the record of each thesis.

Plagiarism can never be guaranteed to be prevented in either the print or electronic domain. When items are made available on open access (ie with no barriers to access) it is easier to detect plagiarism. For example, a supervisor who suspects that plagiarism has happened can run a quick search using a search engine such as Google.

Taught Masters Dissertations

Your Department or Faculty might require a printed copy of a taught masters' dissertation be deposited in a library and this will be stated in the Examination Regulations.

Your Department or Faculty might choose to provide online access to all or a selection of masters dissertations produced by its students. Making your dissertation available in this way increases its visibility and makes Oxford research available for the benefit of society.

Dissertations are submitted to ORA by a member of the Department/Faculty staff. PG masters students are not eligible to deposit dissertations in ORA.
