

Oxford Google Books Project

Background

In 2004, Oxford University entered into partnership with Google to scan the Bodleian Libraries' out-of-copyright holdings, in particular those from the 19th century. We were one of the original "big five" institutions to sign-up to Google's Library Partnership Project, and the first from outside the US. The initial phase of this work completed in the summer of 2009, with several hundred thousand of our books being scanned and made available via Google Books (<http://books.google.com/>).

Items were selected solely on their copyright status and suitability for scanning, and the works that have been digitized cover a wide range of languages, disciplines, and genres. They include the first English translation of Newton's "Mathematical principles of natural philosophy" from 1729, the first edition of Jane Austen's "Emma", and John Cassell's "Illustrated history of England".

Access to Oxford's Copies

Bibliographically, we have chosen to maintain a close connection between the digitized copy and the physical copy from which it was scanned.

1. A search on SOLO will normally produce a list of "brief-display" results. If there is a digitized copy associated with a record, as in this example, a line will be added saying:

*** Digitized copy available - see Details tab for link *****

Important Notes

At present, the PDF files contain scanned images only. They have not yet been OCR'd (i.e. had the images converted to machine-readable text) and therefore you cannot search for words within them, nor cut and paste text from them.

Many of the books digitized are large, and the PDFs are correspondingly large. About 18% of them are currently more than 100MBs. On a fast network, such as that within the University of Oxford, this should not be a problem, with most files downloading in tens of seconds, and the largest in a minute or so. But you should be warned that with slow connections, the large files make take minutes, so please be patient. The Acrobat PDF Reader plugin used by many web browsers reports the size of a file immediately and then shows the progress of the download.

If there are any difficulties viewing the PDF files from within your web browser, then you can always download them and save them on your computer for viewing later with a suitable PDF reader. Adobe provides the free Acrobat Reader for most computer platforms at <http://get.adobe.com/uk/reader/>.

There is a known bug in the default PDF viewer currently supplied with the Chrome browser, which manifests itself with certain PDF files, including ours, causing it to crash with the error "Aw, Snap". Until a fix has been provided for Chrome, you may be able to view the PDF in Chrome by changing the plugin from Chrome's PDF Reader to, for example, Adobe Acrobat (assuming this is on your machine). The interface for doing this is displayed by keying about:plugins into the Chrome address bar.

Feedback

We welcome your feedback, which we trust will help us improve this service. We also welcome your reports of any errors in the downloaded files, such as illegible or missing pages. We may not be able to supply corrected pages in the short term, but the information we collect will help us to plan for doing so in the future. Thank you for your feedback!

Please email your feedback to dbooks@bodleian.ox.ac.uk.
