

THE HISTORICAL RECORDS OF THE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

A HANDLIST OF REGIONAL RECORDS
TO 1945

INTRODUCTION

The following list gives full details of all the traceable surviving records of the Conservative Party at regional level, for the period up to 1945. The records of the National Union and Conservative Central Office (held at the Bodleian Library) on the one hand, and of the individual local constituency Associations on the other, are not included in this list. The former are fully covered in the catalogue of the Conservative Party Archive (where most of the below items will also be found), and there is a separate summary list of constituency records, compiled by the present author, which is also available at the Conservative Party Archive or on request from myself (email: BAL@LE.AC.UK).

The regional organisation of the Conservative Party in England and Wales during this period can be divided into two types: the linking together of the constituencies within a county, and the co-operation of several counties in a larger regional organisation. The form of the latter changed at several points after the initial decision of the National Union in 1886 to establish ten regional bodies known as Provincial Divisions. Eight of these were groupings of counties, whilst the other two cases of Yorkshire and London (called 'Metropolitan') contained enough parliamentary seats to form a region on their own. In 1906 many of the regions disintegrated into separate counties, so that the ten Provincial Divisions became thirty; apart from London and Yorkshire, the two regions where most of the counties remained linked were the Midland Union (centred on Birmingham) and the Eastern Counties. In the 1920s there was a move back to broader regional groupings, with the Welsh counties linking up in 1923, Lancashire and Cheshire combining as North-West in 1925 and several of the southern-central counties forming Wessex in 1926. In 1930 the National Union adopted new rules which created twelve Provincial Areas, each matching the territory for which Central Office's regional offices were responsible: Northern Counties, North West, Yorkshire, Wales & Monmouthshire, Midland (effectively West Midlands), East Midlands, Eastern, Western, Wessex, Home Counties South, Home Counties North, and the Metropolitan Area (London). Seven of these already existed, and Northern Counties and east Midlands were immediately formed in 1930-31. In the south-east and south-west there was much stronger county particularism and resistance to mergers delayed matters for several years. However, Essex and Middlesex federated in 1932, South East in 1936 and Western in 1937, so the Area structure was complete before the outbreak of war in 1939.

Scotland had an entirely separate organisation: the Scottish Unionist Association. This held its own Conferences and had its own Council and Committees, with representation from all parts of Scotland. Below this 'national' tier of organisation, Scotland was divided into two Areas, known as the Western Division and the Eastern Division. The former was dominated by Glasgow, and included the western Lowlands and part of the western Highlands. The Eastern Division covered the rest of the Highlands and the eastern half of the central and border counties, and had three main centres; Edinburgh, Dundee, and Aberdeen. The surviving records of the Scottish Unionist Association's central organisation and of both the regional Divisions are listed below, after the records for England and Wales.

In some regions, no records dating prior to 1945 have been found, and this has been denoted by a blank entry. County Division records are listed under the Area in which that county was included in the 1930 rules. Throughout this list, all items containing any material earlier than 1945 have been included; but records which start after 1945 have not. The latter is a far larger body of material, as extensive records survive for almost every Area since the end of the Second World War.

Appended to this list is a survey of the surviving national and regional records of the Agents' organisations, prior to 1945.

KEY TO ABBREVIATIONS

The first element in the description of each item is its physical description. This is followed by details of the particular organisation and the dates covered, and (where applicable) the depository's reference number. In order to save space, the following abbreviations have been used:
